Characterising the structural pattern of urban road networks in Ghana using geometric and topological measures

Gift Dumedah, Emmanuel Kofi Garsonu

e00095 | First Published: 18 February 2021

This study characterized road networks using geometric and topological indicators for urban roads in Ghana which are characterized by informal and poor layout. Given the lack of adequate infrastructure for traffic monitoring in Ghana, the spatial distribution of betweenness centrality could be part of the critical resource to provide insight for traffic management. These findings provide the basis to inform transportation planning and management on critical issues, particularly, based on the spatial distribution of betweenness centrality it is possible to identify problematic locations within the road network which are most vulnerable to traffic congestion.
