Course information:

Course Title	Language and Society
Course Number	307
Course description	The course aims to explain how language varies according to social variables such as class, gender, ethnicity, age, and regional background. Code-switching by bilingual speakers and in multilingual situations is illustrated with reference to particular contexts. The diglossic situation of Arabic is closely examined. Language planning is exemplified in relation to specific language policies.
Course Objectives (i.e. Learning Outcomes as specified in the Course Specifications)	To study the relationship between language and society by focusing on language variability and identity.
